June to-day has been unbinding
All the beauty of her hair;
The fragrance of her tresses
Floats through all the golden air,
And the greenness of her garment Lies about us everywhere.

There hast burst a hidden odor From each bud the sun unlocks: There is laid a rosy garland On the brown and rugged rocks; All along the brook's meander Gleams the purple of the phlox.

One would think that, late last evening, While the sky hung calm and blue, A sudden wind had shaken All the stars in clusters through, And bathed the sleeping meadows In a shower of golden dew.

Through the vale melodious flow, Where the birds like painted shadows

Low and liquid seems to swoon; In the spirit of thy beauty
Is my soul baptized, O June!
